* * * * It has even been said that it would be quite as well if the pres ent session of congress did nothing, and the question went over for the decision of the people at the polls next fall. It is a sad mistake-the question cannot go over. Under the position understood to be as samed by President Johnson, reconstrucion of some kind is rapidly pushing forward every day, and it is not exactly of the kind which congress has it in its power to prescribe. There are only two provisional governors yet remaining; troops are mustered out; the states are being rehabilitated in all their departments, and soon nothing will be wanting but readmission to congress, the pressure in favor of which will immensely accumulate with the lapse of time. Congress may stand still, but reconstruction assuredly does not. Why, then, should members waste precious time, and divert and weaken the salutary vigilance of the people, by theorizing over the causes and antecedents of the situation, when prompt and judicious action is the want of the hour?
